Lia sat amongst the men in the city square as the philosophers were speaking rapidly about what they believed the nature of the universe to be. She found their lectures fascinating, but was usually chased away by the men who were strong followers of Aristotle and believed women to be just above children, animals, and plants when it came to intelligence and significance in the world. Of course men were at the very top, and were always going to be there no matter whether she liked it or not. But she didn't let them deter her. After all, listening to Aristotle was just simply one minor school of thought, and there were thousands of others that she could ascribe to, and did.

Sometimes she would get tired of being stared at and shooed away and would wear her brother's robes and hide her face so that nobody would ask questions. Other times she would stand behind the trees, listening privately. Sometimes she could even convince some of her best friends to shield her between them when they went to the lectures, although they had no interest in listening to a group of old men speaking, they knew it was important to her and would tolerate it stoically as she learned and listened so that she might have a more open mind and colorful point of view when she went back home to deal with her domestic life. She wasn't very excited about the life that everyone had planned out for her. It was great being Greek but it was also kind of a drag to have to stand in the shadow of your muscular male counterparts. Of course, it was really nothing to complain about when you got to walk around surrounded by unbelievable looking men with muscles that looked as if they were sculpted right from the marble of the gods themselves.
